PREFACE

THE first volume of this Register brought the history of Oriel, as a place of education for young students, down to the end of the seventeenth century. By that time, the character of the College had become definitely fixed, and the type which it assumed was that which ultimately became the normal one.

Before the close of the fifteenth century, the number of Oxford students had already fallen considerably. In the next century, the dissolution of the monasteries, carrying with it the disappearance of the houses of students maintained by the great religious orders, operated still further in the same direction. It is not easy to determine the extent to which the medieval secular College admitted within its walls or provided for the instruction and discipline of young students not holding places on the foundation. In some Colleges leave was given by the statutes for the admission of a few Commensales, in Waynflete's language filii nobilium, or a few poor scholars. But the bulk of the extranei were accommodated in the Halls. Some of these Halls were independent, and had a continuous life of their own. But a great many, probably the larger number, came to be in the hands of one or other of the endowed corporations, and were served by members of the society which owned the buildings[1]. An examination of the lists of Principals in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries shows several instances in which this kind of appropriation had already taken place[2].

[1] See Mr. Buchan's History of Brasenose College (p. 2), where the distinction between dependent and independent Halls is well brought out.

[2] At Oriel and elsewhere, Fellows who were inclined to undertake the instruction and supervision of young Scholars found their opportunity in the Principalship of a Hall connected with their own College: and the way was thus made easy for the introduction, at a later date, of undergraduate members within the walls.

The transformation of the University into a confederation of Colleges, and the extinction of the class of non-collegiate students, might well have come about in the natural course of things, and as part of the process of evolution. That its coming was accelerated, and that it was effected at last under some external compulsion, was no doubt a consequence of the social and political changes produced by the Reformation.

Of the secular Colleges, ten only had been established before the end of the fifteenth century. To these no fewer than six were added in the sixteenth. But it is noticeable that, with the exception of Corpus, every one of the new Colleges took the place of some older house of learning. Brasenose College, founded in 1509, was the direct successor of Brasenose Hall, the Principal of which society was transferred to his new headship without change of title. Christ Church represents not only St. Frideswide's, but also Canterbury College and Peckwater Inn. Trinity took possession of the buildings of Durham College: St. John's of those of St. Bernard's: Wadham was erected on the site of the House of Austin Friars[1]. Jesus succeeded to the empty body of White Hall, almost before the breath was out of it. This large increase in the number of Colleges, accompanied by and closely connected with the disappearance of other rival institutions, could not but have a serious effect on the constitution of the academical republic. The Heads of Houses, each clothed with large powers over his own society, possessed collectively a weight of authority which would in any case have given them a predominant control over the government of the University.

Not only for political reasons, but from other and more generous motives, Elizabeth and her ministers desired to maintain an effective control over the great seats of learning: and in the Heads of Colleges they found the instrument that they wanted. By one statute, imposed on the University during Leicester's Chancellorship, the initiative in all academical legislation was placed in the hands of the Hebdomadal Board: by another, the admission of students was confined to members of the Colleges, including the few surviving Halls.

[1] St. Mary's College in St. Michael's parish was dependent on the Order of Austin Canons, and perished in the Suppression. No benefactor appeared to re-establish its academical position. Its modern name, Frewin Hall, was not given to it till the reign of George the Second, when its site was occupied as the private residence of a physician.

It was under these new conditions that the University assumed the peculiar character which has ever since attached to it. It now for the first time became a place of resort for the sons of the gentry, the finishing school for young men of the better classes before their entry into public life. The prescribed courses of study were mainly designed for the training of the clerical profession: but Oxford was much more than a clerical seminary. Not divines only, but leading statesmen, lawyers, wits, men of fashion, had kept terms at College. The phrase is significant. It was within the walls of his College that the young Oxonian's academical life was now passed. The tutor who directed his studies, the Dean who punished his offences against discipline, were the College officers. In that society he formed his friendships: to that he looked back in later years with the warmest regard. This change in the character of Oxford student life was the direct consequence of the policy enforced under Leicester's Chancellorship.

But although the opportunity of entering on this new career was offered to all Colleges alike, it was not embraced by all with equal alacrity, or maintained with equal constancy. William of Wykeham's foundation, and those of Waynflete and Fox, established on his model, were already charged with the maintenance of young scholars, and might consider that there was no room for outsiders, or that a few filii nobilium was as much as they need accommodate. All Souls for a time received a moderate number of poor batellers or servitors, but during the Civil War these disappeared, and the College has ever since occupied the unique position which it now holds. Merton showed great unwillingness to admit extranei within its walls. The experiment was more than once tried and deliberately abandoned. Till far into the nineteenth century the number of its members, not on the foundation, remained exceedingly small. But in most of the other bodies, the change was cordially welcomed: University, Exeter, Brasenose, Trinity, can all show a long list of distinguished noblemen, commensales, and commoners. The most famous roll of all belongs to the great House of Christ Church.

No better example of this type can be seen than that which is exhibited by Oriel. Although belonging to the earliest group of medieval foundations, and governed by statutes which made no provision for the reception of undergraduate scholars, it was one of the first to adapt itself to the changed conditions of the age of Elizabeth. Scanty as our information is for the sixteenth and the early part of the seventeenth century, there is evidence to show that Oriel had begun to receive students at least as early as the time of Sir Walter Raleigh. And it was no doubt one of the results of this enlargement of its numbers that the old buildings were pulled down, and an entirely new fabric erected in the years 1618 to 1641. Without the assistance obtained from the liberality of its old members, this work could hardly have been undertaken by the College.

In the earlier volume of this Registrum, some account has been given of the several classes, Commensales, Commoners, and Batellers, of which the undergraduate body was composed: and these distinctions continued to be maintained at Oriel down to a comparatively late date.

First in position stood the order of Commensales. These, as has been shown elsewhere, were marked off from the lower class of Commoners by their higher rank or wealth: and during the academic stagnation of the eighteenth century it was in their favour that the strict rules of discipline were most easily relaxed. In many Colleges, the extravagance and disorder, which the Gentlemen Commoners represented, led to their discontinuance: although they were to be found in large numbers in the Halls. Only in one or two Colleges of good position was the order maintained in any high repute. Oriel was one of these: and the place which it took in the early Honour lists was won for it in a large degree by the industry and ability of its Fellow Commoners. There is no class which in proportion to its numbers has contributed so much to the reputation of the College. But this high standard was not uniformly maintained: distinctions based on wealth and rank came to be thought unsuitable: the numbers steadily dwindled, until in 1865 the College resolved that no more should be received.

Of the Commoners, little new has to be said: but the catalogue goes to illustrate the independence of local connexion which has throughout its history been a conspicuous feature of Oriel. The somewhat large proportion, in the eighteenth century, of Glostershire, Somerset, and Devon names, may be due to the loyalty of old Frank Fellows or of the holders of College livings in that quarter: but there is hardly a county in England or Wales which is left wholly unrepresented in the list. It is worth notice, that in the case of youths admitted from beyond the seas, it was for some time considered prudent to require a larger amount of Caution Money than was asked from those nearer home. Ireland stood, in this respect, on the same footing as the American and West Indian Colonies.

Scholars and Exhibitioners, elsewhere forming a considerable part of the undergraduate body, were of late introduction at Oriel. Mrs. Ludwell, a sister of Dr. Carter (Provost 1708–1727), left an endowment for two Exhibitions, to be held by natives of Kent: and Henry, fourth Duke of Beaufort, granted an annuity of £100 for the support of four Exhibitioners, to be nominated by his successors in the title from among natives of the three counties of Gloster, Monmouth, and Glamorgan. But the holders of these endowments formed no distinct class: their own rank in the College was that of Bateller or Commoner, according to their circumstances. It was to the good fortune of their birth, rather than to their intellectual merit, that they owed their modest stipend. They wore no Scholar's gown: they had no special place in Chapel: no greater degree of diligence was required of them: they differed in no way from other junior members who came up with leaving Exhibitions from School. The patronage of the Dukes of Beaufort has at all times been impartially exercised for the benefit of the three privileged counties: and most of the well known families of that district have in their turn been represented at Oriel. But at no time has any higher standard of proficiency been required than that applied in the admission of other independent members.

The time came at last when Oriel was to abandon its peculiar characteristic, and to conform to the prevailing pattern. Scholarships, open to competition from outside the College as well as within it, and filled up according to merit shown in examination, were first established in 1838. There are some still living whose recollection of Oriel goes back to the time before this innovation. Not twenty years ago, at a College Gaudy, a distinguished Oriel man was called upon to propose the toast of the Scholars of Oriel. He knew nothing of any class called by that name, but he fell back on the Oriel of his recollection, and discoursed on its eminence in the field of Classical Scholarship.

Before the end of the eighteenth century, the Poor Scholars, Batellers and Servitors had ceased to exist as a distinct order. Three Bible Clerks [1] alone survived, the representatives of what in an earlier time had been a well marked element in the composition of the undergraduate body. Here, as elsewhere, the tendency of modern sentiment has been to remove distinctions which might appear to put a stigma on poverty; and though much has been done to assist students of scanty means to enter the University, the mode employed has generally been that of direct subsidy, and not a lower scale of charges, marking a difference of rank. Some light duties are still attached to the Bible Clerk's office; and some small items in the calculation of his emoluments still remain, from which the curious might reconstruct his now forgotten collegiate status. But in all important respects, he stands on the same footing as the Scholar, to whom in recent years he has certainly not shown himself inferior in academical distinctions. In this connexion, mention may be made of the Exhibitions lately established in honour of two eminent Oriel men. Mr. Thomas Hughes (admitted Commoner 1841) was warmly interested in the formation of workmen's Co-operative Societies, and during many years contributed by his advice and assistance to the success of the movement. In recognition of his services, a considerable sum of money was raised among members of these societies, and offered for his acceptance. Mr. Hughes declined to receive any personal gift, but, at the request of the subscribers, suggested that the fund should be applied to the support of a Scholar at the University, and indicated his own College as the body with which the endowment should in the first place be connected. This proposal resulted in the establishment of a Hughes Scholar, chosen by the College out of the sons of Co-operative members nominated by the Council of their Union. The first Scholar was elected in 1884. The experiment being found successful, a second Scholarship, of similar character, was founded in 1890, in honour of Mr. Edward Vansittart Neale (admitted Commoner 1827), a lifelong friend of the same movement.

The removal of the social barriers, which the old distinctions of class appeared to set up, and which they assisted to maintain, has brought the members of the same College into closer social relations. They now meet on a footing of equality in Hall and Lecture Room; the rules of discipline are enforced impartially over all. Opportunities of acquaintance are more easy: common tastes and interest more naturally lead to friendships.

Another cause which in recent years has done even more to obliterate social divisions, and to strengthen the sense of common membership, has been the growth of athletic competition. A century ago the practice of games, such as cricket and hockey, belonged to school life only, and they were given up, along with bird-nesting and hoop-driving[1], on coming to the University. There the exercises most in fashion were riding, horse-racing, tandem driving, boxing, fencing. Proficiency in these gentlemanly accomplishments, however much it might command admiration, was a personal distinction, and only indirectly, if at all, contributed to the reputation of a College. It was a new feature in Oxford life when school games first became tolerated as an occupation for grown men. The first race between College crews may date back as far as 1815. The first Oxford and Cambridge cricket match was played in 1827. Football did not appear till considerably later.

The spread of interest in athletics has not, of course, been confined to Schools or Universities. It is common to all parts of the kingdom, and is shared by all ranks of society. But it is important to notice its effect among ourselves. Whatever other results it may have, for good or harm, it has certainly created a new core of sentiment; by identifying the whole body with the success or disgrace of its representatives on the cricket field or the river, it has helped to stimulate College patriotism. It has also had much to do in establishing those easier and more friendly relations between undergraduates and dons which contrast so strikingly with the traditions of the past.

Athletic distinctions will not, however, be found among the particulars recorded in this volume. An exhaustive search through all the possible sources of information would have required an amount of time and trouble altogether out of proportion to the value of the result. For a great part of the period the materials for a complete record do not at present exist in any convenient form: much would have to be collected from scattered and accidental sources: and probably not a few names, well known in their generation, would escape observation. To make a selection would be both invidious and misleading: and the task of compiling a complete list must be left to another chronicler. But whenever that work is accomplished, all classes, Commoners, Scholars, Bible Clerks, Exhibitioners, will be found well represented in the athletic bede-roll of the College.
